The incredible lunar TEMPLE: European space bosses reveal plan for 50m high 'dome of contemplation'

- Perpetually sunlit peak close to the Moon's south pole
- Would be built on the sunlit rim of Shackleton Crater, near proposed lunar base
- 50 m-high domed structure Temple will be 'symbol of unity for humankind'

It could be a temple like no other - and with a view that really is out of this world.

The European Space Agency has revealed plans for a lunar temple to be built alongside mankind's first outpost on the moon.

The 50m high dome, close to a planned moonbase near to the moon's south pole, would give the first settlers 'a place of contemplation'.

Artist Jorge Mañes Rubio, part of ESA's future-oriented Advanced Concepts Team (ACT), designed the temple to be built alongside ESA's planned moonbase.

The European Space Agency says the 50m high dome, close to a planned moonbase near to the moon's south pole, would give the first settlers 'a place of contemplation'.

'I've been having all sorts of discussions with my ACT colleagues, including speculating on the likely needs of future lunar settlers,' said Jorge.

'What kind of social interactions will they share, what cultural activities and rituals will they have, and what sort of art and artefacts will they be producing?

'Humans have been creating art for at least 30 000 years, so I have no doubt this will continue in space and on the Moon.'

The 50 m-high domed structure would be built using 3D printing of lunar soil.

'The result might resemble 'abode' architecture, an ancient method of building that is still made use to this day,' adds Jorge.

Jorge selected Shackleton over nearby Malapert Crater because Earth is perpetually visible from Malapert, while from Shackleton it will only be seen for two weeks at a time, inspiring more independent thinking.

'This was a big source of inspiration for me, along with 18th century utopian architects such as Étienne-Louis de Boullée and Claude Nicolas Ledoux, who designed massive structures too large to be feasibly built on Earth – but practical in the Moon's one-sixth gravity.'

The 'Moon Temple' is intended as a symbol of unity for humankind, reflecting the pull that our natural satellite has always had on the human imagination, ESA says.

EUROPE'S MOON BASE PLANS

The European Space Agency's plans to build a village on the moon are part of a much wider scheme to explore the far-flung regions of our solar system.

Speaking at a recent conference, Esa boss Jan Woerner said: 'I think we should go first to the moon and then further on.'

He added that Mars should not be our ultimate goal and said he is 'quite sure humans will go further.'

'Lunar settlement represents a perfect chance for a fresh start, a place where there are no social conventions, no nations and no religion, somewhere where these concepts will need to be rethought from scratch.

'Humans have brought flags to the Moon, but they've been bleached white by sunlight since then – almost as if the Moon is protecting itself from such terrestrial concepts.

So this Temple is intended as a mythic and universal structure that can hopefully bring people together in this new environment in novel ways.'

After thinking about this article, it became clear what it is all about. Simply put, it is about promotional advertising. The Trump Administration has pledged to pump money into NASA, and that will float a lot of boats. This article looks like a high school science contest entry, and the ESA picked it to get people excited about space travel so they can jump on the money train. It will never happen because they can't go to the moon, or Mars for that matter. Here we are 40 years after the so-called moon landings and we are still using giant bombs to launch into space. Why? Because it is cheap compared to the billions to be made from launching things into the Thermosphere where temps are higher than the melting point of steel. How many satellites are up there now? Over 30,000? Lol....yeah right.

With all due respect Kracker, you don't appear to understand temperature, which is why you believe the temperature of the thermosphere would melt steel. It wouldn't my friend, it wouldn't even melt plastic. And before you challenge my statement, please consider the following first: Temperatures in a sauna typically exceeds 100 degrees C, i.e. sauna temperatures are above the boiling point water, and yet the people inside those saunas are not burned by temperatures exceeding 100 degrees C. Why do you think that is? When you understand why, then you should understand why the temperature of the thermosphere is not a problem for satellites or any other unmanned or manned craft.

They'll never build it because humans have never been to the moon. NASA's new 'orion' project even confirms it, if you look it up. On their video of the project they say 'Once humans will be able to conquer the Van Allen NUCLEAR RADIATION belts, humankind will be able to fly craft to the moon & even beyond the moon'. I watched the moon "landings", all of them and it seemed convincing at the time but we have never flown beyond an Earthly 300-mile orbit since...WHY?. It was all B.$ $HOVED down our throats. Think for yourself Popeye instead of watching YouTube conspiracy videos. And DON'T put made up comments in quotes, because that's dishonest. Orion is a NEW spacecraft with MODERN electronics. VA belt radiation can crash/damage modern electronics, so modern electronics must be radiation hardened and/or properly shielded. NASA said they wouldn't risk sending people through the VA belts inside Orion until they tested the electronics in Orion FIRST by sending it through the belts. They did that in Dec 2014 by sending Orion through the area of the VA belts with the highest radiation. Orion performed perfectly, proving it is safe for astronauts to be inside as it went through the belts (i.e. the electronics will not fail). Regarding "Was It Only A Paper Moon", James spoke to the curator of a museum, NOT to the director of the Apollo missions, where ALL claims made by James have been debunked years ago. But of course, there will always be a gullible audience who fall for such claims :-)
